Portfolio commentary

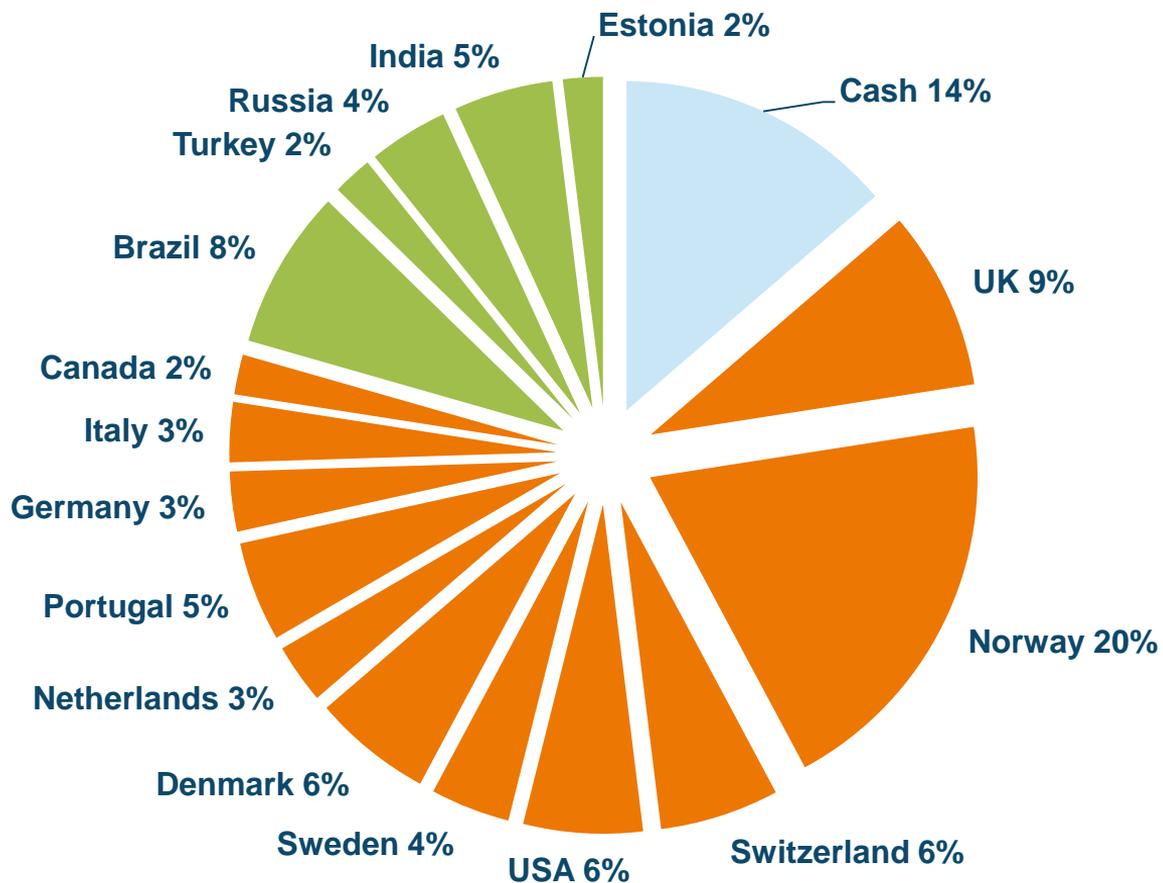

- In January there was a further reduction in credit spreads, with the largest changes seen in the High Yield segment, i.e. bonds with lower than Investment Grade rating. In the Investment Grade segment, the spread changes were much smaller.
- We also saw a continued increase in long-term interest rates. It is not only the US rates that are going up, in January the German 10 year swap went from 0.66 to 0.82 percent. Although increasing rates are usually positive, changes like these cause bonds with matching maturity to decrease in value. With such a low absolute interest rate level like in this example, the change is rather substantial.
- Another point of interest is the very large number of new bonds being issued. Many companies obviously find today's low levels attractive and want to lock in a low funding cost by issuing bonds. The credit spreads may have gone down further if these large amounts had not been flooding the fixed income market. On the other hand, there are a lot of bond investors searching for yield who are willing to invest in bonds with a positive yield regardless of the risk-reward.
- SKAGEN Credit did well in January due to the tighter spreads and the low interest rate risk. The fund has reduced the risk over the last couple of months, as today's low credit spreads make it harder to find good cases where the upside outweighs the downside.
